My time with the Black Watch (R.H.R.) of Canada Cadet Corps 2497 played a pivotal role in shaping who I am today. When I first moved from Belfast, Northern Ireland to Montreal, I faced the challenge of adapting to a new culture and environment. Being able to join an English-speaking cadet corps gave me a sense of belonging during that transition and provided a community where I could build confidence, friendships, and skills in a familiar language.

The Black Watch Cadet Corps gave me my first real exposure to leadership, discipline, and teamwork. The mentorship I received, the challenges I faced, and the opportunities to grow both personally and professionally laid the foundation for my future career in the Canadian Armed Forces.

Those early lessons carried me through my studies at the Royal Military College Saint-Jean, where I graduated as an officer, and continue to guide me in my current role as an Air Operations Officer in the Royal Canadian Air Force. Today, deployed on OP REASSURANCE in Latvia, I often reflect on the values and confidence that were instilled in me as a cadet.

I am proud to say that the Black Watch Cadet Corps was instrumental in my development and remains a key reason why I serve with dedication and purpose. The program not only develops strong citizens, but also inspires future leaders of Canada.
